

The open society is an ideal society design by Karl Popper based on liberalism. Ideally, an open society is characterized by majority voting, patchwork technology and freedom of expression. This is based on an evolutionary model. Freedom of expression corresponds to the inevitable and desired variation. Piecemeal technology corresponds to reproduction and majority voting to selection. In addition, there is as much welfare state as necessary and as little welfare state as possible to ensure that all groups in society can work together on an equal basis and without friction (health insurance, unemployment insurance, accident insurance, pension insurance, basic security).

As the number of parties represented in parliament increases, proportional representation makes it impossible to overthrow the government without bloodshed through majority voting. This is a great danger for the open society. The cancel culture destroys freedom of expression to generate necessary new ideas and identity politics for elites replaces necessary social politics. The governments have long since bid farewell to the bottom 16% of the population and are firmly seated in their seats of power. The party parliament protects them from the population like a praetorian guard.

This wolf of totalitarianism comes in the sheep's clothing of cybernetics with elitist identity politics instead of social politics and Calvinist, imperial and global spread of this totalitarianism.
